

You might think of the web as a way to show your images to a much wider audience than you can achieve with an exhibition.

Make the web work for you by having a website or blog where you show your images, in low resolution. A blog can help your images come up in search results that lead back to you. On the downside, once your image/s are out there, there is no turning back.

When dealing with infringements online, choose your battles. If a blogger is using your images but they've credited and linked back to your website, maybe that's an OK or even a good thing. If a company is using your image, for anything at all, make them pay you and/or stop.

Asserting your copyright is one thing but being able to actually prove copyright is important.

Julie Grahame, aCurator.com.